ON BEING ECONOMICAL WITH THE TRUTH

‘Being economical with the truth’ is an expression that describes a careful use of facts so as not to reveal too much information. In common usage, it is generally understood as a euphemism for deceit, whether by volunteering false information — that is, lying — or by deliberately holding back relevant facts.

THE TWO SHIPS

A Talk at the Monday Club, by Lee Bridges

Two ships lay side by side some years ago in the River Fal in Cornwall. Their history and background could not have been more diverse. One of them was ‘The Redeemer’ — a missionary boat, used in bygone years by people carrying the Gospel far and wide. The other had been impounded for drug smuggling, having brought into the country drugs to a street value of £9m.

In the Rear-View Mirror

‘[I]n the Europe-oriented-and-dominated world of the nineteenth century the western hemisphere became out of bounds for colonial expansion. But not for investment. Europe, after a few years of doubt, stood ready to invest in the American gamble. Throughout the century the flood of “foreign aid” grew and grew until in the half century preceding 1914 Western Europe, led by Great Britain, ‘had invested abroad almost as much as the entire national wealth of Great Britain. . . . If the same proportion of American resources were devoted to foreign investment as Britain devoted . . . in 1913, the flow of investment would require to be thirty times as great. The entire Marshall Plan would have to be carried out twice a year”.’ (Dean Acheson, Present at the Creation: My Years in the State Department, published 1969 by W.W. Norton & Co., Inc, p. 7)
